

The Theodora Oringher Toxic Tort and Environmental Litigation Practice Group has extensive experience representing manufacturing and related companies in toxic tort and environmental litigation ranging from individual personal injury lawsuits to multiparty, complex environmental pollution lawsuits arising from Superfund regulations.

Our unique attributes and resources permit us to handle even the most complex, multiparty environmental litigation, utilizing the latest technology to manage and organize the defense of large-scale environmental claims.

We have expertise in handling claims stemming from alleged on-the-job exposure to excessive levels of alleged malignant chemicals and substances. We have successfully defended against these cases by showing a lack of notice or causation of injury, improper standing, good conduct of the defendant, efficacy of the substance, lack of product identification, and so forth.

We have litigated these cases in both state and federal court, and have experience in serving both as lead or local counsel.
